1. What kinds of memberships does UNWTO provide?

The UN World Tourism Organisation (UNWTO), a branch of the UN, works to make travel safe, sustainable, and available to everyone. The three main types of UNWTO members are Full Members, Associate Members, and Affiliate Members.

a) Full Members: The UN considers non-member countries to be full members. These are the countries that comprise the group. They can cast ballots and have an impact on how travel is handled in other countries. Full members help the UNWTO make decisions in addition to utilising its research, best practices, and networking opportunities.

b) Associate Members: The UNWTO recognises regions or groups of regions, but they are not obligated to manage their own international relations. Usually from tourist destinations like autonomous territories or regions with special status, these members work for the organisation. Associate Members are still able to speak and act, but they do not have the same voting rights as Full Members.

c) Affiliate Members: Travel associations, educational institutions, non-governmental private businesses, and local tourism authorities are all qualified to become Affiliate Members. Affiliate members can participate in events, work on projects with other members, access UNWTO's global network, and more. Affiliate members are vital in promoting cooperation, information exchange, and idea exchange between the public and private sectors of the tourism industry, despite their inability to cast ballots.

Full members are nations that are not part of the government. Associate Members are in a special position. Affiliate members are organisations or groups that are not connected to the government. This is to make sure that as many people as possible can work together to promote eco-friendly travel.

2. Who is eligible to become a Full Member of the UNWTO?

A country must meet several requirements in order to become a Full Member of the United Nations World Tourism Organisation (UNWTO). The UN or the majority of its members must agree that a country is not a member of the UN in order for it to become a full member of the UNWTO.

To be a state, you have to do the following:

Be Independent: A country must be free and recognised by other countries in order to be admitted as a Full Member.

A country must embrace the UNWTO Statutes and show that it is dedicated to its goals, which include promoting eco-friendly travel, according to the organisation.

Follow these guidelines: The state must get written consent before proceeding. A vote in the General Assembly requires the support of two-thirds of the Full Members.

Pay Your Bills: Members in good standing must pay their dues each year in order to support the organization's budget and take part in its events and programs.

All UNWTO events are open to full members, who can also vote in the General Assembly and run for office on the organization's boards. Thanks to the group, they can also conduct research, meet people from all over the world, and receive help with technical problems.

To put it succinctly, non-member countries can only become Full Members if they accept the organization's rules and receive approval from its existing members. Because of this status, they have a lot of power and responsibility in the tourism sector.
